Tulalip healing: surviving community trauma

By Kara Briggs-Campbell, guest writer, Red Hummingbird Media

I can't seem to think clearly. I can't sleep. I cry all the time. I am so angry.

These refrains, heard throughout the Tulalip Tribes since the tragic events of Oct. 24, are common reactions to trauma.

"Our community is still in shock," said Leila Kawar Goldsmith, J.D., of the Tulalip Tribes' Legacy of Healing Children's Advocacy Center. "It will take time for us to begin the healing. Everyone is trying to make it through the day and every day there is new news that is difficult."

The American Psychological Association defines trauma as an emotional response to a

Marysville School district receives dream catcher given to Columbine survivors

Article and photos by Brandi N. Montreuil

Following a tradition set by survivors of the Columbine High School shooting, the Marysville School District and Tulalip Tribes were presented a dream catcher, symbolizing survival, on November 3.

During a modified school district board meeting, representatives from Sandy Hook Elementary and delegates from the Red Lake Nation in Minnesota gave the dream catcher and shared their story of healing.

Marysville-Pilchuck High School Interim Assistant Principal Lori Stolee and Interim Co-Principal Deann Anguiano take possession of the dream catcher, Monday, Nov. 3, 2014, at Marysville School District Administrative offices.

terrible event. Events like the one that touched Tulalip and Marysville last month causes not only individual trauma in those injured and among witnesses, but also community trauma in the extended web of interrelated, interconnected families who make up the Tulalip Tribes.

Community trauma—like a stone thrown into a pond—has rippled throughout Tulalip’s tight knit community. In the days ahead, many people could have unpredictable emotions, strained relationships, fear and physical symptoms like headaches and nausea.

“People are affected in very different ways and it is important for professionals and communities to respect that there is no one right way to heal from a mass shooting trauma,” said Lucy Berliner, the director of the Harborview Center for Sexual Assault and Traumatic Stress.

“Some people want to handle it in their own way,” she said, “Others will find the shared events to be healing. What’s important is that the community stay together.”

At this point, experts say, every reaction is normal as long as it is not hurtful to the person or the people around.

Senator John McCoy, speaking at one of the tribal community vigils, said that many people are reacting with anger. While that is understandable, he urged, “Don’t say something in anger or post something on social media that you are going to regret in three weeks or three months.”

The Tulalip Tribes mental health counselors say parents have the special role of modeling healthy responses for their children, who could be reeling from the shooting and the ongoing news coverage. At the same time counselors realize that parents may also be struggling with their feelings.

“I’ve noticed that people need permission to express what they are feeling,” Goldsmith said. “Someone said, ‘I haven’t cried because it wasn’t my child.’ I have another friend who said, ‘I don’t have the right to cry since my relative didn’t die.’ These are symptoms of trauma, the not knowing if you have a right to feel the pain.”

Tulalip’s Mental Wellness Director Sherry Guzman said trauma that doesn’t get processed through positive expression or mental health counseling can turn into depression. She said, Tulalip mental health counselors are ready and willing to meet with tribal adults or children, wherever they are most comfortable, whether in their homes or at the tribal offices.

“We are a strong community,” Guzman said. “We can take this. But we will be stronger if we talk to each other or even talk to a therapist.”

In general, experts on community trauma say the best thing for kids and adults to do is get back to normal activities as soon as it is reasonable and possible. Even if it is hard after a terrible event, by engaging in constructive activities, whether school, work or social events, people can again look with hope to the future.

“Some things cannot be anticipated or understood,” Berliner said, “and all you can do is continue to live in the best possible way.”

Coping with Trauma Q & A

By Kara Briggs-Campbell

Why am I feeling this way?

It is normal for people to feel shock, numbing, confusion and even anger after an event such as the shooting at Marysville-Pilchuck High School. Loss of appetite, stomachache or sleeplessness are typical responses.

I wasn’t even involved, why do I feel anything?

People have memories that may be happy or sad. Sometimes a difficult event can trigger memories that cause old feelings to occur. An incident like this can affect anyone in our community.

When should I worry?

If feelings of sadness, anger, confusion or hopelessness last for more than a few weeks, or if they get worse, or the person has trouble managing daily tasks, seek professional help.

What should I do if someone talks about suicide?

Take this very seriously and assist them in getting help. Keep talking with them, ask if they have a plan and listen carefully and get them help by contacting a school or a police officer, or call 1-800-584-3578 for the Snohomish County Crisis Line.

How can I talk to my children about this terrible event?

Let the child know it is okay to talk about what has happened. When the child is ready, it will help him or her to talk about the crisis with trusted adults. When talking to kids, keep asking, “Is there something more?” and “What else are you thinking?” For kids, it can be hard to come right out with the thoughts and fears they are holding in.

Why do so many people want to talk about this?

People, including students, may need to talk about a traumatic event in order to feel better. They may need to say where they were, what happened, and say it over and over to understand their feelings or the event. Students may be texting each other or communicating on social media. This is normal for their age group and a way for them to share their feelings and thoughts. Some people don't feel comfortable talking. It is important to respect both kinds of reactions.

What can I do?

Anyone can be a help and support by being patient and listening. It's natural for us to try to solve another person's problems by offering advice, but remember that being a good listener is the single, most important thing you can do to help someone in a crisis. You can also help them connect to professional help.

Where can I find professional help?

- To report an emergency dial 911
- National Suicide Prevention Line: 1-800-273-TALK (8255)
- Snohomish County Crisis Line: 1-800-584-3578
- Crisis TEXT Line: Text "Listen" to 741-741
- 24 Hour Crisis Line: 1-866-427-4747

The intimate journey of an American Indian physician and national health columnist as he navigates the health care system and gains a deeper understanding of himself and his health risks. Dr. Arne Vainio works on the Fond du Lac (Ojibwe) Reservation in northern Minnesota, where his Native patients face grim health statistics. His impending 50th birthday, coupled with his frustration with middle-aged Native men who avoid health screenings, prompts a revelation: he needs to heed his own advice.

At high risk for diabetes, heart disease, stroke and cancer, Vainio chooses to confront the health issues that jeopardize his future by undergoing medical screenings, making diet changes and adopting a lifestyle necessary to prevent a fatal outcome. This poignant story reveals documentary film took two years to make and it has been shown to a number of Native American audiences throughout the United States with Dr. Arne Vainio being on hand to answer questions about health care issues and about the film.

The program also includes several powerful testimonials from community members who have experienced the premature loss of Native men in their families, along with explanations of several diagnostic tests told from the patient's point of view.

The new job market

By Jeanne Steffener, Tulalip Higher Education

According to the U.S. Bureau of Labor Statistics, manufacturing jobs have declined about 35% since 1980. At present, we are seeing a resurgence in the labor market due to jobs moving back into the U.S. because American companies have finally realized that taking the jobs offshore was not a very good idea for production that requires a highly skilled labor force.

The big worry over the loss of blue-collar jobs has also accelerated. The result is the "hollowing out of the middle", leaving either low or high paying jobs, with those higher paying jobs requiring a significantly higher skill set. As the jobs come back, we see that there are fewer but better jobs. These jobs require more training. While some of the training is provided by employers, most companies require prospective employees to come prepared with that training.

Furthermore, as we see the baby boomers beginning to retire, companies will be clamoring to fill these vacated spots in the near future. The boomers make up about 20% of the job market. As the exodus continues, four of the five fastest growing jobs will require college and post-graduate degrees. Also specialized training skills such as electricians and welders will be in greater demand as we draw closer to 2020.

The Bureau of Labor

Statistics (BLS) estimates that occupations requiring at least a master's degree will grow by 21.7 percent by the decade's end. The shortage of college graduates to fill these jobs is predicted to be around 1.5 million. If this is the case, now is the time to start thinking about which direction you want to go in acquiring your degree.

A technology revolution is also reshaping the energy sector through streamlined operations, increased productions, and improved distributions, which will create ample job opportunities for college grads over the next decade. While much of the energy sector's hiring over the next decade will involve skilled and unskilled labor to operate drill rigs and tractor trailers, college grads with technical and advanced degrees will be needed to fill lucrative positions as engineers, scientists and technicians. Technology related jobs are on the increase and will only continue to be in high demand. As a result, students with math, science, and computer backgrounds are going to be in a position to claim those positions of "high demand". Colleges and universities are putting greater emphasis on preparing graduates to fill these entry-level positions with a trajectory to move up the ladder.

Let's not forget about the "VERGE" jobs. These jobs model the convergence of technology and sustainability of a green environment. This is a new trend in the future job market which will require a big push in job creation. As global warming impacts our country and globally, we will see not only cities but also states and countries jump on the bandwagon. This is actually a really exciting time because we are going to see mega changes in how we live, work and see the world in its rush to make a correction in the wake of built up carbon emissions and global warming. The need for education to compete in this global economy becomes even more imperative.

Are you feeling the squeeze of the job market and want to make some educational adjustments? Come speak with the staff in the Higher ED department. We can be reached at 360-716-4888 or email us at highered@tulaliptribes-nsn.gov

Elder's Panel honored by Tulalip Tribal Court

Tulalip elders over the past six years have worked diligently to make a positive change in their community through volunteer work via the Tulalip Elder's Panel, an alternative diversion sentencing program at the Tulalip Tribes

Tribal Court for first-time offenders.

On October 17, the panel of volunteers were celebrated by the Tulalip Tribes Tribal Court for their efforts in the community. The special recognition ceremony included Tulalip Tribes council members Deborah Parker, Maria Zackuse and Theresa Sheldon, along with over 30 attendees.

Tulalip elders, Don Hatch Jr., Eleanor M. Nielson, Hank Williams, John Bagley, Lee Topash and Maureen Alexander donate their time on a biweekly schedule, to teach offenders accountability through a unique approach that uses traditional Tulalip culture, the wisdom and experiences of Tulalip elders and tribal court staff to stop re-offending in those, ages 18-42, charged with non-violent crimes.

Enrollment is voluntary and upon successful completion of the program, charges are dismissed. However, the program does not come without its stipulations. Participants are required to complete a host of requirements to successfully complete the program. Requirements include active engagement in their culture and community, regular appearances before the panel, letters of apology, community service and substance abuse treatment, curfews, UA's, anger management and mental health evaluations and no new violations.

Due to the success of the program, the Tulalip Elder's Panel received the Hero's Award in 2009 from the Washington State Bar Association for their volunteer service. This prestigious award typically goes to lawyers but in special circumstances, has been awarded to non-lawyers for their service in the field of law. The program has also inspired state courts to consider implementing a diversion program using the Elder's Panel as a model. In 2011, the National Center for State Courts visited from New York to learn more about the panel.

"There is serious interest in the panel and the work the elders do," said Wendy Church, Tulalip Tribes Tribal Court Director, during the recognition ceremony. "Not only do they save the Tribes a lot of funds in diverting young tribal members out of the criminal justice system, but the Elder's Panel also has a high success rate of clients not returning to the system."

The panel, in 2013, saved the court $20,000 in judicial and probation time, including jail cost, which can run the Tribe more than $100 a day for incarcerated tribal members. The panel sees an 87 percent success rate in participants.

Along with current panel members, former tribal court clerk Alicia Horne was honored for her work, along with Tulalip Tribal Court Judge Gary Bass and Don Hatch Jr., in establishing the panel. Horne is credited for creating the court forms the panel still uses. Former panel members Virginia Carpenter and the late Bill Shelton were also honored for their time and devotion to the Tulalip community.

The dream catcher was gifted to Columbine High School in Littleton, Colorado, following a shooting that left 13 people dead in 1999. It has since been passed onto other school districts that have experienced similar tragedies and evolved into emblem of healing for survivors.

John Oakgrove of the Little Thunderbirds Drum and Dance Troupe from Red Lake Minnesota made the trek from Red Lake as a sign of unity. Survivors of Columbine took the dream catcher to the Red Lake Reservation following a school shooting there in 2005 that left 10 people dead, including the 16-year-old shooter. Oakgrove has travelled to present the dream catcher since, taking along his children who sing honor songs for survivors as part of the healing process. He was there when the dream catcher was presented to Sandy Hook Elementary School officials in 2012 following the deaths of 26 children and adults.

"I hate meeting people like this, but we came because we want to offer our support. We know what they are going through," said Oakgrove.

Sandy Hook Elementary representatives Susan Connelly, Newtown Middle School counselor and Stephanie Hope Smith a member of the Newtown Rotary Club, spoke about the sobering baton that connects the schools.

"We are united in hope. I'm sorry we are united in grief. I'm sorry we have the experience and expertise to share," said Smith.

"This plaque is more than just a dream catcher. It is made with such love. It is our hope that you should never have to pass it onto another community," said Connelly.

Also present during the meeting was Marysville School District Superintendent Becky Berg and board members Chris Nation and Tom Albright, Marysville Mayor Jon Nehring, Marysville Police Chief Rick Smith, Marysville-Pilchuck High School Principals and Tulalip Tribes council members Deborah Parker and Theresa Sheldon.

Little Steps to Big Possibilities

Early Childhood Development

Did you know?

- Early childhood is the most important time in life.
- Even before birth a child has started learning and it's critical to ensure a strong foundation.
- In the first few years of life, 700 brain connections are formed every second!
- Children thrive in a predictable environment. Families can support their child's development by maintaining a schedule around what time they get up in the morning, nap and meal times.
- Families can encourage learning by talking to their children throughout daily activities – even if it's just saying the steps for a diaper change aloud or singing songs in the car.
- Playtime is important! Bubbles, books and blocks will stimulate children's brains. Screen time should be extremely limited with young children. (The American Academy of Pediatrics recommends NO screen time for children under the age of two.)
- There are only about 2,000 days between the time your child is born and when they go to kindergarten. Make the most of every day!

ChildStrive (formerly known as Little Red School House) has been partnering with Tulalip families for more than 30 years. For more information about your child's childhood development contact Courtney Miller at ChildStrive at (425) 353-5656 x7145 or Courtney.Miller@ChildStrive.org.

Tulalip Tribes serve as example for Native people

As urban Native people living away from our communities, it's important to look at our tribal nations for guidance. As cultural epicenters, it is through their sovereignty that we may celebrate our own Native identities, and with one foot firmly planted in our cultural communities, we allow our other foot to seek stability within the mainstream.

Over the last year, the Tulalip Tribes have offered us an amazing example of the important role of indigenous leadership. In March 2014, the Oso mudslide took the lives of 43 people and devastated a small community in Washington. The Tulalip Tribes responded with volunteers, aid, and prayer. Several months later, Tulalip is experiencing their own devastating event, when a young tribal member ended his own life and the lives of his friends. Again, Tulalip's response is an example of the value of indigenous leadership. The people of Tulalip offer support to one another; they offer prayer. Tulalip is showing us that not all school shootings are the same; rather, they're showing us, both Native and non-Native, what it means to grieve and heal.

We are so fortunate to have the Tulalip Tribes serve as an example. I pray for their healing, and I thank them for their leadership.
