On February 3rd, Quil Ceda Creek Counseling (QCCC) held its ribboncutting ceremony, welcoming everyone to tour the facility and view all the resources available to patients seeking recovery from opioid addiction.

At the opening, Tulalip Vice Chair Misty Napeahi said, "This project has taken about five years to complete. I want to thank former board members Les Parks and Jared Parks for bringing this to the table when the tribe was against methadone. With greater understanding and more learning about harm reduction, we are here today and get to save lives... Many of our tribal members and young people are falling into addiction, and The Tulalip Tribes are successors in interest to the Snohomish, Snoqualmie and Skykomish Tribe and other tribes and bands signatory to the Treaty of Point Elliot, January 22, 1855

"We hope these pallet shelters offer a new beginning step for those who need it most as we continue to work towards supporting each and every one of our members in their pursuit of a healthy lifestyle."

- Chairwoman Teri Gobin

Chairwoman Gobin. "It's heartbreaking to think of how many homeless we have sleeping outside in freezing conditions. This pallet shelter provides an alternative solution to be warm, indoors with electricity and, even more than that, a sense of community knowing we haven't given up on our people.

"For those that are homeless and suffering from addiction, the pallet shelter will also offer services like entry into a detox program and admission to the MAT clinic in order to get them on the road to recovery."

The pallet shelter is the result of a newly development partnership with local, Everett-based company Pallet. Their steadfast team built all the individual units on-site in Tulalip in just two days, with their deployment just so happening to occur during the latest snow storm.

Pallet shelters provide the dignity of private space in a healing community environment. They are a proven community solution, built fast and at scale.

"This is a special moment for us as it marks our 100th village build," shared Amy King, CEA and founder of Pallet. "My husband and I started this company seven years ago in a local shop as a way to provide jobs for people exiting

By Micheal Rios

Back in 2018, Tulalip leadership issued a declaration of emergency regarding the opioid epidemic. Under this declaration all tribal agencies and departments were able to make the opioid epidemic a priority and, when given opportunity, collaborate to develop solutions.

It took ample time and much well thought-out, strategic planning to get here, and now Tulalip has debuted several all new services including the Village of Hope, transitional units, the Recovery Resource Center, and a medical assisted treatment clinic. On Monday, February 6, in an excitement-filled grand opening of a much-needed service for Tulalip's growing homeless population, the Tribe formally opened a pallet shelter.

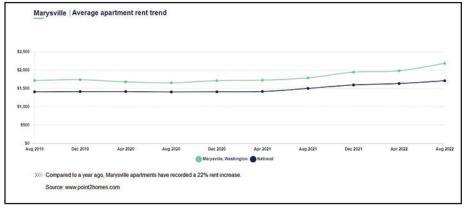

"This means the difference between life and death for some of our people," said Chairwoman Teri Gobin. "Bringing twenty new units here to take care of our people, and also offer additional services from so many amazing staff who are dedicated to healing our community. We have debuted so many resources within the last year to help our people who suffer from addiction and homelessness. We hope these pallet shelters offer a new beginning step for those who need it most as we continue to work towards supporting each and every one of our members in their pursuit of a healthy lifestyle."

There's a strong correlation between homelessness and drug use. In fact, it's estimated that about two-thirds of the perpetual homeless have a primary substance use disorder or other chronic health condition, according to the Office of National Drug Control Policy.

While average rent costs in the greater Tulalip/Marsyville area continue to rise, plus the simple fact that homes on the reservation are extremely difficult to come by, it becomes a pressing social issue to offer some kind of housing solution, however temporary, in order to minimize the risk of tribal members giving into drugs as a means to escape a seemingly perilous homeless situation.

Since Tulalip's 2018 declaration, the opioid crisis has only gotten worse. The number of fentanyl-based overdoses and deaths in our community continues to go up, making it imperative that Tulalip makes strides to help our people find their good way.

"It's imperative we find culturally-relevant solutions and quickly because we're losing so many of our people, especially our young ones, to fentanyl," said homelessness, addiction recovery programs, and the state's justice program. Today, we are in 76 cities and 21 states across the country. This build is especially meaningful because its so powerful, helpful and exciting to be part of building [potential lifelines] in our local community.

"This location holds special meaning for some Pallet employees who previously experienced homelessness in the area and are now finding purpose in building transitional housing to help others in the community," she added.

As stated previously, the pallet community is made-up of twenty 64-square-foot shelters. Each designed and built with the right balance of efficiency and comfort, including climate-control options.

Over the years, Tulalip News has covered extensively the rise of tiny homes and openings of tiny home villages as an impactful means of minimizing homelessness. With special shutout to the on-reservation TERO Vocational Training Center that has churned out wood-based tiny homes for villages in Olympia, Seattle and Tulalip. That being said, these units created by Pallet are next level. Durable - Pallet shelters are made to last with a 10+ material year lifespan. They're resistant to mold, rot, and pests, and can be easily cleaned as one resident moves out and another moves in.

Comfortable - Insulated walls, heat, and air conditioning provide personal climate control, and electricity powers the interior lights and outlets for personal device charging. Spacious with 9-foot vaulted ceilings.

Rapid - Made of prefabricated panels that are flat-packed for shipping at scale, each cabin can be assembled in under an hour with minimal tools. Shelters can be disassembled for flat storage or reuse.

Cost-effective - Pallet offers a cost-effective price point because they use fiberglass reinforced plastic with a foam insulating core for the panels and shelves. Plus, they use aluminum framing.

Safe - Each shelter comes with a smoke detector, carbon monoxide monitor, egress door, and fire extinguisher. Shelter villages are independently inspected by local fire inspectors to ensure adherence to local fire safety code requirements.

The pallet shelter's grand opening marks Tulalip's latest endeavor as part of a multi-department, tribally coordinated opioid crisis response. This response aims to address service gaps including the need for increased community outreach, education and engagement in order to expand present prevention and intervention efforts. "This is a real special day for us in Tulalip," affirmed CAO Rochelle Lubbers. "I especially want to thank our Board of Directors for guiding us in this direction and creating that vision for us that no Tulalip tribal member will ever be left behind. Every single tribal member matters and we will be here to support our people no matter where they are on their journey. Today, the pallet shelter is an important step towards making that vision a reality because it provides low-barrier access to critical services, which is a huge stepping stone to long-term recovery.

"Our goal is to truly help and provide necessary assistance to those folks in the Tulalip Tribes who are homeless and experiencing addiction," continued Rochelle. "These pallets represent not just long-term recovery to residents, but to our whole community. The people who will be residing here are our brothers and sisters, sons and daughters, mothers and fathers. We believe that the pallet shelter offers us a chance to heal people, and for every person healed we heal an entire family."

The easiest way to gain access to a pallet shelter unit located off the intersection of Marine Drive and 19th Avenue is to stop by its main office, the green house out front, during business days and ask for an application. Another way is to stop by the new Recovery Resource Center and speak to staff who also oversee the pallets that can provide more information.

because of this [QCCC], they have a way to get their life back. Our family, community and tribal members are suffering, and their lives matter."

Tulalip tribal member and QCCC Clinic Administrator Tanya Burns said, "This will be a drop in the bucket, but it is also necessary for this community and others. It takes a village, and we are blessed to have such wonderful staff members who are passionate and committed to helping save lives."

The QCCC is set to serve 150 patients at any given moment and provides various services, including substance use disorder (SUD) consultations, SUD assessments, individual SUD appointments, individual treatment planning, SUD outpatient groups, medical and mental health assessments, and referrals to other community resources. The program's three phases are induction, stabilization, and maintenance, a system designed to mitigate a patient's chemical dependency and help them regain control of their life. While using these resources, patients must maintain confidentiality, follow their treatment plan's urinalysis and breathalyzer guidelines, and obey the treatment team contract.

The purpose of group treatment and mental health assessments is to help pinpoint any possible traumas that may have influenced their life and snowballed into their addiction. Group treatment also provides information to patients new in recovery, allowing them to build a community within the program and facilitate personal growth.

In a media release Tanya stated "A lot of the folks that will come in here will have cooccurring disorders. They may have a substance use disorder which can be fairly obvious on the outside. However, they may also have a mental health disorder or something else. We want to treat the whole person."

QCCC did receive their DEA approval and will also provide medication for SUD, such as methadone, Suboxone, and Vivitrol starting November 27th, 2023. However, clinic staff advises that any prospective patients begin their intake sooner rather than later to avoid pushing out their treatment plan. SUD professional Elissa Jules stated that intake can take around three weeks to process and approve a patient. She added that patients can still use the other program resources and courtesy dose while they wait for their medications through QCCC.

While receiving services or dosing, patients can leave their children in the playroom area, where they will be taken care of until the patient is finished. The facility does contain robust security and procedures ensuring the safety of its clients, children, and staff.

Even though addiction treatments like methadone, Suboxone, and Vivitrol have remained quite a controversial topic amongst many, staff on the ground argue that this is the most effective path for recovering patients.

Elissa said, "When I first started, I wasn't big on [patients using] methadone either. I know there is a stigma towards it, and people believe that methadone is replacing heroin or fentanyl, but that couldn't be more false. Methadone doesn't get you high, it blocks patients from the euphoric effects of opioid use. It is a harm reduction program, and we administer these medications and techniques to debilitate opioid use. I've seen it be successful for many people."

The opioid epidemic has affected many communities and families across America. In our area alone, according to Snohomish County, in 2022, over 345 Snohomish County residents overdosed. And drug-related overdoses remain the leading cause of death within Tulalip Tribes. With many health professionals and community leaders working together to fight this epidemic, medications like methadone and Suboxone have made strides in these efforts.

Elissa previously worked at Lummi and the didg"olič Wellness Center of Swinomish before coming to Tulalip. She has seen the effects of opioid addiction within Native communities firsthand.

"I've seen opioid addiction spread heavily across tribes. Overdoses have increased tremendously in the last ten years of working in this field. We're losing a lot of our Native people, and every time someone is an addict, they lose their connection to their culture, whether in the church or the longhouse. The more addicts and deaths we have in our community, the harder it is the hold on to our culture. Sometimes I see patients as young as 12 years old using methamphetamines or have tried opioids, and it's scary."

The QCCC is an excellent resource for addicts ready to take that next step. It is open to tribal and non-tribal members, and referrals are not required. Operating hours for the facility will be M-F 6:00 a.m. to 2:00 p.m., Saturday 6:00 a.m. -10:00 a.m., and closed on Sundays. It solely serves on a firstcome-first-serve basis to avoid long waiting periods and adhere to the needs of patients more quickly. However, tribal members and pregnant women do take priority. For more information about the services, please call 360-716-2200 or drop in at 6330 31st Ave NE, Suite 101, Tulalip, WA 98271.

Saturdays are for Storytelling

By Kalvin Valdillez

The traditional language of the sduhubš is strong within the Tulalip community. And it is apparent that with each passing year, Lushootseed continues to grow stronger as more and more of the tribe's membership develops a connection to the language of their ancestors.

Thanks to a partnership between the Lushootseed department and the Betty J. Taylor Early Learning Academy, the language is introduced to the academy's students as soon as they are enrolled in their birth-to-three program.

Lushootseed is now often present throughout a tribal member's academic career, from early head start all the way to college, as the Lushootseed Language Warriors hold classes at local schools to impart their tribe's ancestral teachings to the future of Tulalip.

In addition to teaching the language at schools, the Lushootseed department does an excellent job at extending their lessons to the entire community by offering classes, both online and in-person, every year. They also make it a priority to ensure the language is accessible at all times for their people, with the development of a fun digital app, an engaging and informative website, and by hosting a handful of community events. And now, the Lushootseed department is taking over Saturdays by dedicating one hour of storytelling to the community over the next several weeks.

Said Lushootseed Department Manager, Michele Balagot, "Most of our Lushootseed classes are all tied into stories. That's where you learn how to do the grammar and get the teachings from each story. Toby Langen (Lushootseed Revivalist), that's how she taught us, was through stories. I was thinking of different ways that we could get the language out there, and I thought why don't we just do stories, here in person, that's how we used to do it back in the day anyway."

The first storytelling gathering was held on February 4th, where Lushootseed Warriors, Natosha Gobin, Thomas Williams, and Kylee Sohappy kicked-off the weekly gettogether and shared a few traditional stories with a number of Tulalip families.

Throughout the duration of the global pandemic, the Lushootseed department brought their lessons to the world wide web by hosting classes on Zoom, and they received a great response from the people during the mandatory stay-at-home order. After seeing the success of the online classes, the Lushootseed Department decided to livestream the storytelling gatherings for those who are unable to attend in person. And if the first event serves as an indication of how many people the department can reach online, the remainder of the classes are sure to be a hit, as that livestream garnered close to 1k views, as well as numerous interactions, comments, and shares.

"These gatherings also help our teachers, so they're more comfortable telling stories," Michele expressed. "Everyone was excited about this, but we do have some teachers who are new and have never told a story in front of people before, so they were a little nervous. One of them was Kylee, and I heard she did a great job with her story."

"I told Her First Gift Basket," Kylee beamed with pride. "It was a story from Vi Hilbert, retold by Michele Balagot, and illustrated by Michelle Myles. It's one of our first hard book cover copies that was published, and we're hoping to publish more by the end of the year."

She continued, "I was excited to be a part of our first gathering with the community, so others can become familiar with the language, because it's an important thing to pass on to everybody in the community."

The classes are held at the Lushootseed department, inside the library of the old Tulalip elementary school. With many Lushootseed Warriors on their team, Michele explained that the language instructors will rotate storytelling duties throughout the coming weeks. And since the gatherings are held on the weekend, Michele left it to the discretion of the Warriors to choose a time that works best with their scheda time that works best with their schedule outside of work.

So be on the lookout for flyers, emails, and social posts as the storytellers of the week will be sharing the details of when the gathering will take place, and where you can catch the livestream. And you better believe that the Lushootseed department has much more planned for 2023, be sure to stay tuned to the syəcəb and Tulalip News as they reveal their upcoming happenings. And as always, do yourself the favor of checking out their website, www.TulalipLushootseed.com, which is updated frequently and beautifully showcases the lifeways of the Tulalip people, and shares much of their ancestral teachings.

"We're trying to reach anybody who wants to hear a story," shared Michele. "We encourage families to come because you can learn together with your child and then you can speak it in your home, that's what we aim for.

"I hope this gets more people interested in learning our language and learning the stories from our ancestors. We need more people involved, so we're trying to get the language out there any way we can. And if anybody has any suggestions about what they would like to see or like us to do, then send me an e-mail (mbalagot@tulaliptribes-nsn.gov) and we will consider it." News.
